

Emma Lou Thayne

Hold

Gray day with a brown leaf refusing at the end of a wind to drop,
why is the crabbed clinging so intricate a part of the dance?
Even cackling on the stiff stem
the flutter hints to the hint of snow:
There will be no acquiescing.
Only the sudden letting go.

EMMA LOU THAYNE, poet, lecturer, and mother of five, is a frequent contributor to DIALOGUE and lives in Salt Lake City.
