Emptying Pockets

Brian Brown

Unload on the dresser top black brick cell phone, keys, waxy-wrapped cough drops, two mechanical pencils, Hertz ball point pen, and wallet from the back, its collected plastic cards and long fold, empty but for a few faded receipts.
What else? Paperclip.
Pinch of lint. And a hazelnut.

Fish it up from the bottom corner, slide a thumb over its ridged curves. Solid, it was immense between your daughter’s finger and thumb as, mid-birthday treasure hunt, blond hair, half fallen, floating around her head and face, she stooped, lifted from the grass this talisman and,
in spite of everything,
held it up to you:
Look Daddy.